In all reasoning there must be something amounting to a diagram before the mind’s eye, and [...] the act of inference consists in observing a relation between parts of that diagram that had not entered into the design of its construction.