Dissociation

...two ideas may be so little allied that one of them may be present to the consciousness in an image which does not contain the other at all; in this way we can imagine red without imagining blue, and vice versa; we can also imagine sound without melody, but not melody without sound. I call this kind of separation Dissociation.

References: W 5:238; CP 1.353

Date of Quote: 1885

URL: http://www.commens.org/dictionary/entry/quote-notes-categories-1