Quote: ... I had observed that the most frequently useful division of signs is by trichotomy into firstly Likenesses, or, as I prefer to say, Icons, which serve to represent their objects only in so far as they resemble them in themselves; secondly, Indices, which represent their objects independently of any resemblance to them, only by virtue of real connections with them; and thirdly Symbols, which represent their objects, independently altogether of any resemblance or any real connection, because dispositions or factitious habits of their interpreters insure their being so understood.
